Example; consider part of the first line of HTML a file might contain: This is the document. The software I've used so far for converting HTML to plain text is called Html2Text. However, it is pretty basic in its functionality. If you're trying to crack the password (as the information within the brackets is useless to you), then there are a few possibilities for doing this: Digitise the file, and use OCR software (there are plenty of free applications available) to convert it to text. Scan the page, and use OCR software to convert it to text. If the page is small enough, try to find the document.xml file, or some other file that uses the same encoding to create a string representation of the document, and make sure that you can open it. If the page is small enough, you could simply copy it into an editor such as Wordpad, and save it as plaintext. If you can't find the document.xml file, or if the file is larger than you can handle, then you'll just have to find something else. Programming of light-driven chemical reactions by proton-coupled electron transfer. Light-driven proton-coupled electron transfer (PCET) is a powerful strategy for the solar-energy-conversion of waste heat. Herein, we report the development of a light-driven chemical-reaction system, which involves an S(N)Ar reaction induced by transient photoexcitation of a PhEt(+) PhEt(-) → PhEt(-)PhEt(+) intersystem crossing process. The reaction is classified as a PCET process, which is driven by protonation of PhEt(+), followed by electron transfer from PhEt(-) to the PhEt(-)PhEt(+) radical pair. 1cb139a0ed
