What's new in PSYCHO:

ANALYSIS THE HARMFULNESS OF PROJECTIONS BY SOME ON THE ENVIRONMENT FOR POLITICAL POPULATIONS To analyze the harmfulness of such projections, I will start by noting, I think it was Louis Mac Neill who said that one of the best methods of psychological study is to overestimate matters considered too risky for a group and to underestimate them for another, see Farr, J., Morf, T. and Zajonc, R. (1981) "On the assessment of risk: Some questions and puzzles" in: Perspectives for Applied Social Research, Vol. 9, no. 2, pp. 25-40. Taking this as a model for analysis, if we take the category of people who reject the possibility of anthropogenic global warming; "denialists" or GW, climatologists and other scientists regarding the potential of GW, they will be considered risk-takers. If, on the other hand, we do believe the GW or related climate change issues are a real possibility, then it follows that those concerned with GW or related climate change issues are risk-taking. While the model presented by Fearon and Laitin examines only the possibility of civil war, not in itself a particularly large concern, military analysts will also consider the possibility of the risk of war. Importantly, the harm of anthropogenic global warming will be, by the very definition of such an issue, very local in terms of the potential costs and concerns. And, it is this very detail, and the fact that one group of risk-takers will be harmed rather than the other, that makes GW a riskier issue (and this is not due to political or personal bias on the part of the risk-takers in question -- not at all). Now, who are the risk-takers? No one denies, I think, that there are very real and legitimate risks, but it is also true that risk-taking is a choice. One of the legitimate criticisms of the GW movement has been the attempt to (more or less) blow an issue without having the full picture, without context, without carefully thinking through the consequences. Often such criticism seems to assume that it is the responsibility of conservatives to accept risks for the benefit of the left, to risk the wrath of the left and to follow the cosmic justice of climate change. In the actual historical
